Ankang, the "Classic" Chinese City
Ankang, China

Take a moment to absorb the contrasting cultures. Women carrying laced umbrellas to protect their skin from the sun, a complexion that signifies beauty and wealth. Old men lounging on their wooden carts — prime napping platforms on humid days — as they await customers to move furniture, boxes or food. Giant cell phone dealers, where eight customer service representatives approach you at once. A man strolling by with a dead chicken dangling from his hand. Electronics and designer clothes shops that blast pop music from their storefronts. And whoa! —

- a donkey pulling a carriage? (I glance back-is that really a donkey??)

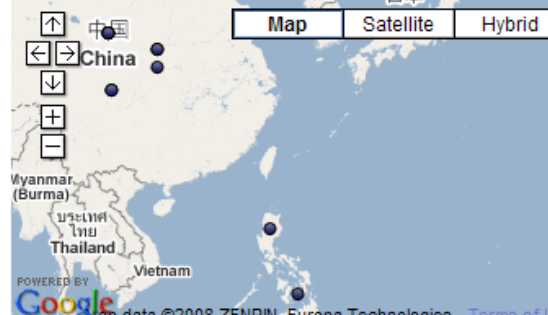

Dinnertime. If you're on a low-carb diet, China can guarantee the fasted results (you'd starve yourself). Noodles and rice are a staple of nearly every meal, and the meals without them are made from some type of bread. I remember one meal in particular, one of my first in the city: a rich vegetable salty-vinegary broth with a flavor that consumes your mouth and lingers on every taste bud. Next to the soup: long, slimy, lasagna-like homemade to be dipped into my soup. For a continually updated list of my most exotic cuisines, visit the "Food" blog.

As I walk home, a cool night air draws crowds to the streets. A young girl in a white-dress, arm-in-arm with her plump, aging grandmother, smiles and says (in English), "Hello!" Men crouch or sit in circles, playing cards on two-foot-high tables, lit by a solitary light bulb hanging from a tree. Along the more commercialized streets: restaurant, hotel and store signs flicker with the semblance of Vegas. A tacky combination of Christmas lights, flashing neon signs, and Chinese paper lanterns.

I arrive home, climbing the dark, narrow stairwell to my apartment. In any American city, these steps would feel terribly unsafe; a breeding ground for muggers and bums...but in Ankang, the biggest crime is cell-phone theft. I feel fine. Walk in, climb into bed and ruminate. There is so much I do not yet understand in such a foreign place. But I suspect time will yet again reveal the message that seems to permeate every adventure—people are people, and we are essentially all the same.

Our President, Barbara Laurenzi, has chosen Rhotoplast as our international project this year. To benefit Rhotoplast, we will host a reception and show at Hedrow Theatre. The goal of Rhotoplast International is to eliminate the incidence of untreated cleft lips and palates in children worldwide by the year 2025. Over 10,000 children have been helped since 1996. We hope you can come support this great cause. Bring family and friends. This is a good way to introduce new members to the work of Rotary.
