The Other Side of the World

This article is not for the squeamish.

Nearly all Cambodians were forced to work in the rice fields. But the country still could not produce enough food to be self-sustainable. To increase productivity, the Khmer Rouge imposed workdays of 12 to 18 hours. And no time was to be wasted: if you were found resting or eating, you were killed. This intense labor created starvation and disease---causing half of the deaths under the Khmer Rouge.

Schools became propaganda institutions, where political instruction and indoctrination were the only lessons. "Work" and "revolution" became the basic principles. Children were isolated from their families, and sometimes forced to kill them. Many were enlisted to become fighters, trained in weaponry and guerilla fighting. They were expected to be superior soldiers: sometimes, when a child couldn't determine the exact number of bullets in a gun---just from holding it---torture was his punishment for ineptitude

And to avoid dissidence, the Khmer Rouge methodologically exterminated anyone who could counter its progress.

Professionals and intellectuals---teachers, doctors, government officials, religious leaders---were all enemies of the system, and were ordered to be killed. Even people who wore glasses were executed. Chances are, if you are reading this, you would not have survived.
